Course Description:

This course considers the historical foundations and ethics of “universal human rights,” as well as the relative extent of an international “culture of rights.” It examines how differences across human communities complicate the straightforward application of human rights discourse and practice across specific topics, in different places, where questions of rights are hotly contested. Topics we look at include: crimes against humanity, rights activism, genocide, biotechnology, gender, ethnicity, religion, migration, nutrition, the environment, the context of war, identity politics and cultural pluralism. Places we visit include: cyberspace, India, post-WWII Europe, Australia, post-Apartheid South Africa, China, the contemporary United States, and elsewhere. In this course we are also interested in how and why cultural considerations have transformed, enriched, and at times thrown in doubt the idea of “human rights.” This includes a concern with the ethical basis for human rights, and the relationship between human rights discourse and practice, on the one hand, and definitions of moral community, on the other.

Our course goal is to explore the tensions between the universal defense of human rights, and the diversity of real world, culturally specific, conflicts, where “rights” are understood in a variety of often contradictory ways. The very notion of “rights” is subject to considerable examination in this course, including ethical justifications for human rights and debates over the limits of rights and different sorts of rights, such as: universal human rights, the state and citizenship rights, intellectual property rights, collective versus individual rights, the questions of relativism, and customary law. In so doing, we take up problems and questions embedded in our convictions about rights, as primarily about: equivalence, mutual respect, justice, the defense of the weak, an international community, the preservation of difference, or perhaps all of the above. Amidst global diversity and inequality, and given the debate over the extent of application of “rights,” is there a role for “rights” in the development of global governance?
